BUILDING BRIDGES

A conversation with Fr. James Martin, SJ

“In a world so torn apart by rivalry, anger, and hatred, we have the privileged vocation to be living signs of a love that can bridge all divisions and heal all wounds.”

HENRI NOUWEN
As humans, we like to compartmentalize things. It helps us organize our lives and confine things that challenge what we believe. We may even separate our religious values from our day-to-day life – to proclaim one thing on Sunday in church, but then live and act differently in the workplace or on social media the rest of the week. It’s natural to think about ourselves and those we care about, but not so easy to consider decisions that affect a broader group of people. How often do we think about those who are strangers or different from us – those in this country who are living in fear of being deported, the thousands of migrants and refugees in the world who are seeking a better life, or those of both genders who are excluded from the church for their sexual identity?

Issues of importance often raise significant debate. It’s good that people care so deeply. But we need to challenge ourselves to debate not for the sake of winning an argument, but in order to discern the best course of action for the common good. Perhaps a worthy place for all debate to start is with our core belief in the Gospel message that all people are created in the image of God. We all share the same human nature and we are all called to values and practices that honor the dignity and rights of all people, especially those who are often the least able to honor themselves. Jesus went as far as challenging us to “love our enemies”. Admittedly this is easier said than done, especially on social media where comments have little consequence and attacks on the person, not the opinion, is the norm. But there are people who are doing it right.

One such person is Father James Martin, SJ, who routinely demonstrates how to have civil discourse and positive communication on social media. We interviewed him to get his take on the polarization that is so rampant in our country today, and get his tips for engaging in more civil dialogue. Fr. Martin is committed to sharing and communicating Jesus’ message of inclusivity and love; to speaking the truth, confronting social injustice, and initiating conversations in the church and public arena via his writing and posts on social media. He invites readers and followers to engage in civil discourse. These conversations are not always easy, but neither are the issues of our times. When asked his mission, Fr. Martin answered with one word: “Jesus”. What, in these times, would Jesus stand for? “If his life is any indication it would be the poor and the marginalized,” Fr. Martin said. “More importantly, how would Jesus engage with others? Perhaps by listening, responding with compassion and strength, and speaking the truth.” As a follower of Jesus and a modern day prophet, Fr. Martin tries to do both. And, like Jesus, he faces criticism, doubt, and challenges for speaking up and inviting conversation on difficult issues of our day. After his recent book, Building a Bridge, was published, he was uninvited... from a speaking engagement at a prominent Catholic university. Throughout the Gospels we can find many instances where Jesus’ prophetic words were not welcomed because they threatened the status quo. Listening, asking people their desires, and responding without judgment are core to Fr. Martin’s ministry success. Recognizing we live in a world that is very polarized, we asked how he sees his ministry of communications in helping to bring people together. “The more you listen and learn, the more you come to understand the spiritual lives of people that you might have thought of as ‘other’, ” he said. Listening with an open mind and heart is an idea reinforced by Pope Francis in his 2014 World Communications Day message: “To dialogue means to believe the ‘other’ has something worthwhile to say, and to entertain his or her point of view and perspective.”

Because we often see vicious attacks on people and their views on social media, Fr. Martin says he works to create an environment on Facebook and Twitter where people feel comfortable engaging and are not defensive. While some allow any comment to be posted, Fr. Martin says he limits people’s ability to ruin it for others and tries to create a space for civil discourse. “I recognize not everyone is going to like me, love me, agree with me,” he said, “but I try to treat everybody who has a thoughtful critique or question with respect, never engage in vilification, ignore trolls, and ban or delete the haters.”

Fr. Martin recognizes social media contributes to both division and unity in the world today. “Just like social media brings us together, it can divide us,” he said. “We only look at the things we are most comfortable looking at. In the past, with three news channels and one newspaper (in most towns), people saw or read the same things, were more informed in a general way and had the same basic knowledge. Now, we can decide what we want to see or not see, and go to websites that only reinforce what we already believe. This can divide us rather than unite us. Also, with so much anonymity, people can feel free to attack people, and this pushes us back into our corners.”

At the same time, Fr. Martin shows us that digital media can help spread messages of love and hold up authentic conversations. The more opportunities we have to initiate relationships around shared ideas and beliefs and invite people to deeper conversation and relationship, the better chance we might have of deepening communion everywhere. Fr. Martin notes that it is important to not be partisan, which can be highly polarizing, and that his primary goal is putting the Gospel out there. Like Jesus, he says he tries not to preach about politics itself, but he recognizes that social justice concerns are often intertwined and related to policies. “It’s the intersection of religion and politics that really seems to draw engagement,” he said. Of course, his posts draw attention and comments that he sometimes responds to in order to deepen the conversation and hopefully to broaden understanding and compassion. The point isn’t to avoid discourse but to find ways to speak the truth and invite dialogue without bitterness, hatred and vilification of individuals.

Fr. Martins’ posts, speeches and writing also frequently address issues the Church, or people in the Church, have found to be difficult, have ignored, or have been challenged by, but are affecting marginalized people. One current example is the status of LGBTQ people in the Church.
Fr. Martin’s book, Building a Bridge, and subsequent social media posts address the Church’s attitude and treatment of LGBTQ people. When asked why he thinks this issue is an important one in today’s church and why he is addressing it knowing he won’t be popular with some people, he simply replied, “They are the most marginalized people in our church – ignored, excluded and in many cases, mistreated.”

“Jesus asks us to go out to people on the margins and Pope Francis has asked the Jesuits to go out to people on the margins and peripheries,” he continued. “There is an urgent need for us to reach out to these people who are excluded from their own church.” In a Facebook post related to the topic of his newest book, Fr. Martin responded:

> It’s imperative for people to accept everyone as a beloved child of God! This is the way God made them. The people themselves are a gift to us. Particularly for young people, it’s essential that parents and grandparents and families accept them. The process of coming out or being open about your identity is extremely painful. I know people whose lives have really been destroyed by parents who have not been accepting. Yet this is what God asks us to do: to love one another. That’s the most basic of commandments.

Although the book has generated controversy, support for Fr. Martin has come from inside and outside the Church, with many priests and bishops publicly offering statements that indicate their own openness to discourse and action on the matter.

We asked Fr. Martin if he considers himself a prophet, especially about building bridges of compassion, sensitivity and respect among diverse and divisive groups. “Well, we’re all prophets, right? We’re all baptized ‘priest, prophet and ruler.’ So, yes, I hope I’m a prophet, as I hope every Christian is a prophet,” he said. Being prophetic in today’s world seems to call for loving people who feel like your enemies and praying for people who feel like your persecutors. In Fr. Martin’s case, it’s not about picking sides. It’s about listening and trying to help people find where Jesus and the Holy Spirit are present and leading us. It encourages us to practice treating each other with respect that allows for dialogue that leads to somewhere productive. Fitting of the title of his book, communication as ministry calls us to be bridge builders, to engage in meaningful discussion and discourse, and to encourage dialogue that might strengthen our faith and awaken us to new or renewed ways of acting on behalf of people in need.

So how do we help to support those on the margins, ensure...
Jesus asks us to go out to people on the margins and Pope Francis has asked the Jesuits to go out to people on the margins and peripheries. There is an urgent need for us to reach out to these people who are excluded from their own church.

FR. JAMES MARTIN, SJ

responding without judgment. What if we start by listening to and coming in contact with someone different than us? What if we search together for truth and insights from different vantage points? What might we gain in greater understanding by engaging with people who are not like us or who think differently than us?

We might ask ourselves the following: In my conversations and interactions with others, have I listened without pre-judging? Have I responded with truth in a compassionate way? Have I found a way to build a bridge for someone on the margins?

Fr. James Martin, SJ, is a Jesuit priest, editor at large of America Magazine, author of several books and consultant to the Vatican’s Secretariat of Communications. He has written for many publications and is a regular guest speaker and commentator in the media on Twitter and Facebook. Before entering the Jesuits in 1988, he graduated from Wharton School of Business and worked for General Electric. After publishing his book, My Life with the Saints, in 2006, Martin was encouraged by his publisher at Loyola Press to begin a public Facebook page. While Martin sees Facebook as a natural outgrowth of his ministry, in a recent interview, he said he resisted it at first, afraid that it would take up too much of his time. He soon learned that was not the case. It became an outlet for him to share information and to engage with people. For some, Facebook is a hobby, for Martin it is a tool and one of the main media of his ministry today. He also continues to write books, and use Twitter and Instagram to share information and engage with people.